Not illustrated. 1883 Excerpt: .would be in most instances unsatisfactory, and therefore the difference of method is to be regarded as due, in part, to the differences essentially or usually existing between a medical and a surgical case of disease. But in respect of this difference of procedure, the Visitors wish it to be understood that the remarks made by them as regards the surgical clinical examination are not to be read as involving approval of the same method of procuring the materials in the case of the Apothecaries Company. In their general observations, comparing the clinical examinations in medicine of the several Royal Colleges, the Visitors had occasion to discuss more at large than is necessary at present the relative advantages of the viva voce method and of the written paper. In the Apothecaries clinical examination the latter method is exclusively followed. The Visitors were not, any more than the examiners, admitted to a knowledge of the steps in detail by which the candidates severally arrived at the conclusions formulated in their papers; nor is it easy, under these circumstances, to judge of the reasons which influenced the examiners in assigning marks to each paper, especially as it was only in a few instances that the Visitors observed notes of any kind by the examiners upon the papers themselves. As practical examples of the difficulties thus arising, the following may be assigned, subject to the remark that the Visitors, not having personally examined the cases, and not having witnessed...
