Excerpt: . . . CHAPTER VIII. THE TRAVELLERS. My narratives, or pictures, must be but a few, selected from among a multitude. My chapter would extend to a greater length than any old novel, if I were to give all I possess. H. Martisead. Love knoweth every form of air, And every shape of earth, And comes, unbidden, every where, Like thoughts mysterious birth. Williss On the 17th of November, 1839, the Emerald reached her destined port, and our travellers were introduced to the London of America. Being now more immediately under Montagnos supervision, they were well supplied with every comfort, and began to feel, that though the commencement of the road to wealth had been thus rugged, they were now on the highway, and should travel it with ease, till they reached the summit of their wishes. Upon my word, that's a fine looking Dutch girl, said Monroe, Montagnos confidential clerk, as Magdellena entered the store, one morning, to select a dress. That's one of my singers, said Montagno. So I supposed, said Monroe, from her speaking in a foreign language. That's the worst of it, said Montagno. There is not one among them that, can speak a word of English; and though they can do very well in the city, where they can be accommodated at a French boarding-house, yet I am a little troubled about their success, when I come to send them about the country. Could you not teach them some phrases, such as they find necessary...
