Then, making another effort, I say, I hope to-morrow will be finer than to-day and yesterday have been. Palley says, Yes, so do I, and dead silence follows. I wonder what Palley is thinking about; either about a new joke that he is presently going to lead the conversation up to, or about the Guillotine. Palley is mad on guillotines. His great ambition is to have a model one. When he goes up to London for leave I believe he spends all his time in the Chamber of Horrors, at Madame Tussaud s. He is rather of a morbid temperament altogether, is Palley. Conversation with him is hopeless. I look up and catch Frontival s eye. He sits next to Jenson on the opposite side. I don t exactly know what to do. I feel that if I look stolid he may think me sulky; while if I smile ten to one afterwards I shall feel I have done the wrong thing. I look away from him smiling to myself, and fix my attention on a picture on the wall. It is a print of the Raising of Dorcas. There are three, or at least two St. Peters in the picture. Dorcas is lying on a very uncomfortable sort of hand-barrow. She has no particular legs, or at any rate has tucked them under her, for there are none visible under the bed-clothes. There are two...
