The Sulzer administration, the constitutional convention of 1915, the legislative session of 1916--in these periods state budget making emerged from obscurity into newspaper wrangles. Political leaders in many parties have come to discuss the question. more familiarly than can most college professors of finance--yet. More literature has been written about New York s budget convulsions than about the budgets of all other states. For a decade to come college classes will wade through this empire state literature and revel in its complications, contradictions and inconclusiveness. Yet in many respects the state and science of budget making are in New York more backward in 1916 than in 1907 when Governor Hughes made the first official plea for budget reform. Why more backward? Because in Governor Hughes plan popular control via popular information was the keynote, whereas in 1916 popular information and...
