Not illustrated. 1912 Excerpt: . . . is cut in two between the prothorax and mesothorax, both parts usually continued to feign death. The part posterior to the cut often remained in the death-feigning attitude for a considerable length of time after the operation. After the severed posterior portions come out of the inert condition, many cannot be induced to assume the usual death-feigning attitude; others will assume the deathfeigning position, and when the abdomen is stroked with a camels hair brush, the legs show evidence of a weak tetanic condition of but short duration which may in a very small per cent, of cases be maintained longer than one-half minute. It seems probable, that in some individuals at least, the shock effect may perhaps cause a renewed tetanic condition of the leg muscles, which condition may last for a considerable length of time after the cut was made. With the exception of the behavior shown immediately after severing the body, the reactions of the severed posterior portion of the body of Belostoma is somewhat similar to that of the decapitated individual. If the body of Nepa is severed between the first two thoracic segments, the part anterior to the cut will react very similar to the intact specimen, while the posterior portion behaves like decapitated individuals. 12. When Nepa is cut across the metathorax behind the last ganglion, the severed posterior part does not respond to any sort of a stimulus; the anterior portion, on the other hand, again reacts similar to the intact bugs. We are...
